St. Thomas Aquinas wrote, "Perfection for man consists in the love of God and of neighbor. Now, the three Commandments on the first tablet pertain to the love of God; for the love of neighbor there were the seven Commandments on the second tablet. But we must "love, not in word nor in tongue, but in deed and in truth." For a man to love thus, he must do two things, namely avoid evil and do good. Certain of the Commandments prescribe good acts, while others forbid evil deeds. And we must know also that to avoid evil is in our power; but we are incapable of doing good to everyone, Thus, St. Augustine says that we should love all, but we are not bound to do good to all. But among those to whom we are bound to do good are those in some way united to us. Thus, "if any man have not care of his own and especially of those of his house, he hath denied the faith." Now, amongst all our relatives there are none closer than our father and mother. "We ought to love God first," says St. Ambrose, "then our father and mother." Hence, God has given us the Commandment: "Honor thy father and thy mother."

Aristotle notes that parents, indeed, give their children three things. The first is that they brought them into being: "Honor they father; and forget not the groanings of thy mother; remember that thou hadst not been born but through them." Secondly, they furnished nourishment and the support necessary for life. For a child comes naked into the world, as Job relates, but he is provided for by his parents. The third is instruction: "We have had fathers of our flesh for instructors." "Hast thou children? Instruct them."

Parents, therefore, should give instruction without delay to their children, because "a young man according to his way, even when he is old will not depart from it." And again: "It is good for a man when he hath borne the yoke from his youth. "Now, the instruction which Tobias gave his son was this: to fear the Lord and to abstain from sin. This is indeed contrary to those parents who approve of the misdeeds of their children.
